During the 2002 Winter Olympics, the Canadian pair skaters, David Pelletier and Jame Sale, became silver medalists after their competition. Many felt they should have won the gold after their flawless performance in the long skate competition. The competition was very close, but the judges awarded the gold medal to the Russian Team of Anton Sikharulidze and Elena Berezhnaya. The Chinese team won the bronze medal. The Russians, while skating well, did have an error in their program. The crowd chanted, "Six, Six," after the Canadian team finished. Clearly, the crowd thought the Canadian team had won the gold medal.

Figure skating is judged on technical merit and style. Unlike some competitions that are based on time, judges must decide who wins by the difficulty of the skater's program, and how well they perform it. After many years of practice and skating a perfect performance, it was disappointing for the Canadian team to come in second place. "When you skate your best and come in second, it is difficult," said Jame Sale.

"That's the way it is. If I didn't want this to happen to me, I would have gone downhill on skis," stated Pelletier, who was near tears. A few days later the judges awarded the Canadian team a gold medal! The Committee decided that the French judge did not act properly. The Canadian team shares the gold with Russia. Winning a silver medal is an accomplishment many will never achieve. Why do you think Sale and Pelletier were disappointed? What do you think about how figure skating is judged?
